Contextualizing the Phrase

Historically, women’s intellectual engagement and emotional expression have been scrutinized through various cultural lenses. In many societies, women have been encouraged to be reflective and thoughtful, yet simultaneously criticized when their introspection leads to indecision or anxiety. This dual expectation has shaped how overthinking is perceived among women, often blending empathy with pathologization.

Causes of Overthinking Among Women

Psychologically, overthinking may stem from heightened sensitivity to social cues, greater emotional awareness, or internalized pressures to meet multifaceted roles – including caregiver, professional, and partner. Hormonal influences and brain chemistry also play roles in cognitive processing differences.

Furthermore, societal narratives that encourage perfectionism and self-critique disproportionately affect women, intensifying rumination and cognitive overload.
