The psychological and emotional toll of these experiences has been profound and long-lasting.

Memories of Displacement and Separation

One of the most common memories among war children is that of displacement. Families were often forced to flee their homes to escape the advancing enemy, leaving behind everything they knew. Children recall the chaos and confusion of these journeys, the long walks, the crowded trains, and the constant fear of being caught. Separation from family members was another harsh reality. Many children were sent away to safer areas, often never to see their parents again. The pain of separation and the uncertainty of whether they would ever be reunited lingered for years.
