The Red Scare and McCarthyism represent a pivotal era in American history, characterized by widespread fear of communist subversion and the resultant political persecution during the Cold War. This period not only reflects the geopolitical tensions between the United States and the Soviet Union but also exposes how domestic anxieties can erode civil liberties and democratic norms.

Historical Context

Post-World War II America faced new global challenges as the Soviet Union expanded its influence, leading to a bipolar world order. The first Red Scare after World War I had set a precedent, but the second Red Scare, spanning roughly from 1947 to 1957, was more intense and politically charged.
