The company's strategic location near the Brandywine River provided easy access to raw materials and transportation, which was crucial for its early success. DuPont's dominance in the gunpowder market was further solidified during the War of 1812, as the company supplied the majority of the gunpowder used by the American military.

Expansion and Diversification

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, DuPont began to diversify its operations. The company's scientists made significant advancements in synthetic materials, leading to the development of products like nylon and neoprene.
