What Are Rhetorical Questions?

Rhetorical questions are queries posed not to receive an actual response but to encourage reflection or highlight a particular idea. Kelley employs these questions strategically within speeches or writings to stimulate the audience's thinking process, often guiding them toward a predetermined conclusion or reinforcing a critical message.

These questions subtly highlight important issues, encouraging the audience to consider their implications more deeply. For example, a question like "What would our society look like if we ignored justice?" forces reflection on ethical foundations without directly stating the point.

Encouraging Critical Thinking

Rather than providing direct answers, Kelley's use of rhetorical questions prompts critical thinking. This technique allows the audience to explore various perspectives and form their own interpretations, making the communication more interactive and impactful.

Creating Emotional Impact
