Wolfe meticulously details the origins of the Mercury program and the selection of the Mercury Seven astronauts, probing the societal pressures and political imperatives that shaped this endeavor.

The Concept of 'The Right Stuff'

Central to Wolfe's thesis is the idea of 'the right stuff'—a constellation of traits including courage, skill, and a stoic acceptance of risk. The book considers how the astronauts' heroism was instrumentalized to bolster public morale and justify governmental expenditures during a tense geopolitical period.
