Historical Context and Local Media Landscape

Cleveland's television market is a microcosm of the broader American media environment. Historically, TV guides played a pivotal role in organizing and communicating programming schedules to viewers, especially when cable providers offered hundreds of channels and limited on-demand content.

Local stations such as WKYC, WOIO, and WEWS have been instrumental in delivering regional news and entertainment. Their programming schedules, once disseminated through newspapers and printed guides, have migrated online, reflecting changes in consumption patterns and expectations.

Technological Shifts and Viewer Behavior

The rise of digital platforms has challenged the traditional TV guide's function. Streaming services, DVRs, and smart TVs offer personalized content discovery, reducing reliance on static schedules.
